Appendix C: - Arterial Travel and Speed Sampling Overview

Arterial Travel Time and Speed Sampling Overview

In support of the first congestion report (formerly the ADAC Report), which was assembled in 2004, the Department began collecting and analyzing travel time and speed samples obtained using probe vehicles equipped with Global Positioning System (GPS)-based tracking devices. These tracking devices differ from traditional GPS-based navigation systems in that they record the second-by-second position of the probe vehicle, calculated in the vehicle by the device by triangulating on the signal's broadcast from each satellite in a cluster of satellites. The probe vehicle drivers are instructed to travel a prescribed sequence of roadways and to travel at the speed of the flow of traffic around them, which results in a "chain" of sample data being recorded on the device. At the end of the sampling period, the recorded data is downloaded from the device. Subsequently, that data chain can be analyzed to derive information on travel time duration, spot and average speed, the specific start, end, and duration of significant traffic queues, and travel delays relative to a free-flow or speed-limit speed.

To derive such information each chain first needs to be disaggregated into a set of "trajectories", which are directional samples each of which began at a unique time-of-day and had a unique travel time duration. These trajectory samples of traffic congestion fundamentally differ from traffic turning-movement counts (used to derive CLVs), which count and record the movement of all vehicles entering and exiting a specific intersection during a fixed time period (i.e. each successive 15-minute interval during a three-hour peak period). In a 15-minute time period, a probe vehicle on an arterial roadway may travel 5 to 10 miles passing through and "sampling" traffic congestion conditions for the through movements of many intersections located along that arterial. A different probe, either on the same day or a different day, is used similarly to sample traffic conditions on other arterials that cross the initial one. Thus over time, samples of congested conditions at each of the approaches to an intersection can be observed.

For most of the sample chains, the drivers are instructed to: (1) travel from one end of a roadway to the other end, (2) turn around, (3) travel back in the opposite direction to the start, (4) turn about again, and (5) then continue traveling back and forth several times. In some cases, more than one roadway would be sampled before the driver completed the directional run and returned to the point of origin. In many cases, one driver could thus collect three or four directional samples within a three-hour peak period. In other cases two or more drivers can be assigned to one route if the route is expected to be particularly long and/or slow, in terms of travel time duration. Depending upon the specific analytical application, a "temporal resolution" that samples between two and four observations in the peak period is usually a sufficient determinant of the range of congested conditions – of fastest to slowest. The more frequent the temporal resolution, the more certain would the analyst be that the true slowest and fastest conditions have been observed – however, such more frequent temporal resolution requires the availability of additional resources. The term "temporal coverage" refers to the overall time period covered by the sampling. (i.e., weekday AM peak period, mid-day peak period, and PM peak period).

Another dimension of the sampling is that of the "spatial coverage", which refers to the geographic extent of the sampling. In 2009 sampling coverage included the urban and developing parts of the

Appendix C: - Arterial Travel and Speed Sampling Overview

County, thereby excluding the rural parts of the County. The term "spatial resolution" refers to how closely spaced the samples were on different parts of the overall highway network. Within the In 2009 spatial coverage area, samples were conducted on: (a) major and minor State Highways, (b) major and minor County arterials, (c) selected municipal roadways, and (d) selected M-NCPPC (park) arterial roadways. No samples were explicitly collected on Interstate Freeways or National Park Service Parkways.

The arterial travel time and speed samples collected in 2009 expand upon the comprehensive sampling that was done in 2007, which was a significant departure from the more ad hoc and limited sampling conducted in 2004, 2005, and 2006.

The particulars of the sampling plan were developed by Motion Maps LLC, one of the consultants assisting Planning staff on this work program item. This included identifying which roadways would be sampled in conjunction with other roadways on particular days so as to try to efficiently use the time to actually be sampling and to minimize "dead-head" travel to and from the location of the survey crew meeting sites and of the turn-around distances along the chain. In the subsequent analysis and summary phases of the work, Motion Maps LLC provided training on the use of their specialized analysis software that enabled Planning staff to also work on the processing and analysis of the numerous dataset chains, ultimately converting them into trajectory samples of GPS travel time and speed.

A Note about Data Reliability

The GPS-based travel time and speed survey data discussed in this report was collected in late February and early March of 2009. Roughly 85% of the County's major highways and arterials (excluding those located in the rural policy areas) were sampled during the PM peak period (4-7pm). The majority of the major routes and corridors surveyed were driven multiple times in each direction during the peak period. In most cases, the reliability of the times and speeds recorded was greatly enhanced via the consistency of the results seen in the samples along various corridors. In a few cases, a limited number of samples or non-recurring congestion created by traffic incidents may have reduced the degree of reliability for some of the results. For a few select corridors, largely those that are partially within Central Business Districts, some GPS errors appeared in 2009 data. Mapping analysis of GPS probes in these locations indicated that the position of the probe wandered when the vehicle was stopped. Although this type of error did not influence travel time, distance of the segment appeared elongated as these small wandering points accumulated over one or two miles of congested roadway. Samples that were observed to have this error were therefore not included in the travel time by distance analysis but were included in Arterial Mobility and travel time by time of day analysis.
